"When I read the morning papers, and found that General Jubal Early had departed this life, it struck me with a profound sense of emotion. He has gote! its aleeps his last sleep. He has fought his last battle, and no sound shall wake him to giory again, but his name will live in the hear's of his countrymen, yes, my countrymen, his name will live in the pantheon of history, forever. He was the last man to sign the ordinance of secreton. He did so with a manly protest sgainst it, but when he drew the sword in behalf of the great cause of the South, he threw away the scabbard forever. The sheen of his sabre glistened in the sunlight of perhaps an hundred battle fields, and he kept up the fight to iast moment of his life. Jubal Early and Jefferson Davis had many attribute m common. They were sturdy heroes, when our grand old president fought the hast battle of the Confederacy at Fortress Monroe; when he knocked down the Monroe: When he knocked down the guards who attempted to manacle him, he showed his devotion to principle, and endeared his memory forever to his countrymen. Mr. Hunton, of Fauquier, who approved the motion, stated that he would be in favor of passing such a bill, if it would be given the proper consideration. He was opposed, however, to hasty legislation on such important a subject. He under-stood from the newspapers that the bill had been introduced in the Senate some time weeks ago, and that for some time no action was taken on the matter. Finally, a resolution was agreed to, stating that no change of the existing election laws was desirable at this time, and only a few days ago it seemed that it was deemed advisable to take decisive action in the matter. If it was actually becessary to enact a law in that matter, he, for one, would be willing to come back for an extra session to pass such measures, but he was not willing to act for any such bill which had not been considered in the committee. If the bill should come up in the House at this juncture, the debate would be limited to ten minutes for each speaker. If there was a demand for such a law, he was perfectly willing to give it all the time cossary so that a bill satisfactory to the whole State might be passed.
